How will you be assessed during the course?

There is no coursework element in this subject. All three examination papers are two hours long and are sat at the end of the two-year course. During the two years of study there will be various in school assessments using past papers and mock examinations to allow you to monitor your progress on this course. You will also have regular end of topic tests and current affairs quizzes to ensure you are comfortable with the course content and staying up-to-date with current affairs.

Where could this course lead?

Politics is an academic A-level, widely respected by employers and universities. The course gives students an understanding of the contemporary world and so is relevant to careers in journalism, law, economics, international relations, philosophy and politics itself. This subject compliments a wide range of other A level subjects including Geography, History, Media Studies, Economics and Languages. Some of these subjects have considerable content and skill set overlap.

Further information

In Year 12 we visit the Houses of Parliament and the Supreme Court. The department runs lunchtime revision sessions to ensure students are well prepared for the linear examinations. We also have organised a delegation to take part in the Model UN and encourage students to gain work experience with local MPs regularly. It is essential to have enthusiasm for the subject. You must follow the news and be interested in it. All the examination questions involve essay style written answers so you must feel comfortable writing formally and at length. The subject welcomes lively conversation and debate which leads to an enjoyable classroom and learning environment for all students.
